Aphids in Fall Alfalfa Seedings

If alfalfa was seeded this fall, be on the alert for spotted alfalfa aphid infestations. Check your seedling alfalfa every day from the time it germinates until the plants are well established. As soon as the alfalfa comes up, make daily checks across the fields. Get down on your hands and knees and examine several plants around you. Look on the undersides of the leaves for aphids and honeydew. Brush a stiff white card over several plants and check the card and the ground for aphids. Make several of these stops diagonally across the field. Look for spots in the field that appear to be stressed for water - there may be aphids there. If you find only a few winged aphids scattered over the field, don't treat them, but continue to examine your stand very closely every day. If you find large numbers of winged and/ wingless aphids and honeydew, treat the field as soon as possible.

Recommended control is the use of 1-2 to 1 pint (1-2 actual) malathion emulsion concentrate per acre in 20 gallons of water. Harvesting or growing should wait at least seven days following application.

Check Cattle For Bangs

Bangs disease is a disease of livestock that requires constant supervision. Cattlemen tend to forget testing during periods of declining cattle prices. Naturally this is a false concept of economy.

There are approximately 4,600 head of cattle in Appomattox County. Of this number, only 1,004 have been tested so far this year, the majority being dairy cattle. Twelve were found to be infected although this represents only 1.2 per cent of those tested, it remains a potential threat to the health of both owner and cattle on the farm.

Testing is not the final step in Bangs control, it is but one important step. The second step is calfhood vaccination. Of the estimated 1,250 heifers in the county, only 176 have been vaccinated. It is important that all calves 4 - 8 months of age be vaccinated. There is no cost attached since it can be had at government expense.

Prussic Poisoning in Livestock

New growth that occurs in either sudan grass or sorghum after a frost is extremely high in prussic acid content and is very dangerous to livestock.

All sorghums and sudan grass contain a substance which upon breaking down releases prussic or hydrocyanic acid. The amount varies depending on the type of sorghum.

Young plants are higher in prussic acid than those approaching maturity. Small plants, young branches, and tillers are high in prussic acid. The leaves contain from 3 to 25 times more than corresponding portions of the stalk in plants in the boot stage and the upper (younger) leaves contain more than the lower leaves.

Sudan grass is safe to graze after it has reached a height of 18 inches or more, except in unusual conditions such as after a frost or when it has been stunted by prolonged drouth.

Frosted or frozen sudan should not be grazed until it is completely dry and there is no evidence of new growth.

If sudan grass or sorghum is ready to cut at the time of a frost or freeze, it may be cut during the first day after the frost and used for silage or hay.

FINDS THAT STRIP CROPPING PAYS

W. L. Coleman's farm, shown above is an example of how strip cropping pays. Mr. Coleman, of Oakville, says: "In 1954, I applied to the Soil Conservation District for assistance. Ed Dickerson, Soil Conservationist, came out and re-commended contour strips, plus sod waterways where needed. Since using strips on my farm, I have had the Soil Conservation technician lay out strips on all my land needing stripping. I have found that it increased production and helped to stop erosion."

Contour stripcropping and sod waterways have been successfully employed in Appomattox County for many years as one of the practical measures to conserve soils.

Contour stripcropping is a method of farming so that the fields are laid out around the hills and are separated by strips of close growing crops. The width of the strips is determined by the steepness of the slope of the field. They should be as long as possible so as to save turning so often.

Contour stripcropping is a practice needed on most cropland that is worked in clear tilled row crops. When the rows are run up and down the hill, the rain follows the rows, washing away the soil, fertilizer, lime and sometimes the crop itself. Level rows running around the hill, hold more water and let it soak into the ground for future use. Any water running off the row crop strips goes to the strips with close growing crops. There it is cleaned, a lot more soaks into the ground and the rest is slowed up and spread out.

Clean water does not wash gullies as fast as dirty water does. Under this system, erosion is greatly reduced and the most use is obtained from the fertilizer and lime.

Dry weather does not hurt crops in a good system of stripcropping as much as it does crops worked in large fields. The water that has soaked into the ground is available to the roots of the plants.

Fields that are stripcropped become smooth and the machinery does not have to slow down for gullies and washes.

Some people say that the strips are too small, to work easy, but some people who do custom work prefer to work for farmers who practice stripcropping. Most farmers, often working in strips for one year, say that it is the easiest way to work and that they would not farm any other way.

The best time to lay out strips is in the fall and winter before any plowing is done. By proper planning, the land that has been in row crops can be seeded to small grain as usual and there will be no interference with that. The rest of the crop land can be laid out, the rotation worked out so that a balance of crop acreage will be maintained. The land seeded to small grain should be laid out next fall.

For further information, see John C. Cole, Soil Conservation District Supervisor, or Ed Dickerson, Soil Conservationist.
